Two Prong Approach to Supply Chain Stability

Over the last 10 years the word “sustainability” has become synonymous with being environmentally friendly, but the real intention of sustainability was running your business in a way that will exist for the future. Being a good environmental steward is just part of that.

When we focus in on supply chain sustainability, there are two ways we need to attack it: ensuring a constant and reliable supply, and ensuring a company is being the best company it can be.

As climate change continues to impact the world, supply chain professionals need to ensure that they have a continuous and socially responsible supply. No longer is it okay to just go to the lowest bidder in the newest cheap labor country. How do you know they will be able to reliably supply you?

Once you solve that issue, then you need to look at your own sustainability in the supply chain. Are you “overpacking” because it’s easier on inventory? Are you using recognized alliances and unions to ensure producers are doing things right.

Highlighted will be many of the problems supply chain professionals deal with, and offer solutions to help them answer the question; is my company sustainable for 2050?

Speaker: Dan Healy, Greif Inc.

Dan Healy is currently a plant manager with over 20 years of manufacturing experience. In his current role for Greif inc., he is responsible for the production of industrial packaging products that represent the beginning of the supply chain for most companies. He has extensive knowledge of supply chain and business sustainability. Dan served four years as a board member for the Western New York Sustainable Business Roundtable and has also served as an adjunct professor at Niagara University.
